Researcher nutritionist at the global department of De Heus Animal Nutrition. Originating from France, she obtained her master in animal nutrition at Wageningen University in 2012 after finalizing her major thesis on protein nutrition for layers at de Heus. Since then, she started working as junior researcher and quickly grew into specialized researcher for layer and turkey nutrition. Currently, she is designing and executing trials to optimize animal nutrition that support full expression of the highly productive genotypes, whilst minimizing feed costs. Together with breeder, hatcheries and universities cooperation, worldwide recommendations of De Heus are adjusted based on latest knowledge. In close collaboration with the international product managers, the knowledge is implemented into concepts where she is assisting in training local teams.
